Our girls are helping to win the war. At an anti-aircraft gunnery school they operate instruments which record where the shells burst and so tell the gunners how near they were to the mark. The target's the radio-controlled Queen Bee.

Special movie-cameras photograph the bursts - a scientific help in training the men. Through her viewfinder the girl sees Queen Bee running the gauntlet. Noting which guns are on the target she calls out to a telephonist, who passes the word on to the gunners.

--

In its magazine the finished film is taken to the dark-room where other girls develop it.

--

A revolving drum quickly dries the film, after which it's passed on to be examined. For that purpose it's run behind a magnifying glass, to give the examiner a clear picture on which to make a report.

It all helps to train good gunners quickly. If here and there a man takes a long time to complete the course, who can blame him ?
