CHIMPANZEE BECOMES CIVILIZED

As if there is not enough monkey business in the world just now, a chimpanzee rearer in Florida brings up his animals to the millionaires' way of life. Once satisfied with a bag of peanuts for lunch, Adolph (the chimp), ate twelve beers and twenty cigarettes a day, now costs as much to keep as an elephant.

The young chimps don't have such an easy life. They get baths instead of bitter, and soap is about as popular with them as it is with most young humans.

Civilization has its good points, but, like ourselves, the chimp has doubts.

WOLF

At the Denis-Roosevelt Chimpanzee Farm in Dania, Florida, Adolph relaxes with what must be a chimp cocktail. Careful, Adolph, don't drop your ashes on the rug!

Life's pretty soft for an old chimpelike Adolph. But for shrimp chimps like Gee Gee, here, . . . well, like life Gee Gee?

Now, do you like life Gee-Gee?
