

ONE-JOB JETTY

Wrecked near Casablanca by winter storms which have been pounding the Moroccan coast, a French freighter is breaking up. Nothing can be done to save her - but her cargo is worth two million pounds. So if the ship can't be brought to the dockside, the dockside must be brought to the ship. And that's just what's being done. Great lorryloads of rock are dumped into the surf to create a jetty which will be used for one job only - to unload a doomed vessel.

It's a race against time - and the one-job jetty is costing £290,000 to build. But it's worth it, when there's two million pounds' worth of cargo to be saved. Every hour counts in one of the most unusual salvage tasks in the history of the sea!
