

RUSSIANS ON THE RIVER.

Russian jets at London Airport were visible evidence that two-way airline service between London and Moscow has begun. For the Head of Aeroflot, Chief Marshal Zhigarev and his colleagues, a trip down the Thames was arranged by way of relaxation. The Thames was once described as a thousand years of liquid history, and the little trip gave the Chief Marshal glimpses of the story of England, modern as well as ancient. The Russians were very impressed with the Tower Bridge, for many Soviet merchant Ships tie up in the Pool. And in that place where enemies of the State used to get Totalitarian treatment, the Tower itself.

It's a good thing all round that another breach in the Iron Curtain has been made by the Anglo-Russian Airlines,
