

RAND HOLDS EASTER SHOW

All Johannesburg made for the showgrounds at the opening of the Rand Easter Show. Always a big event, it was better than ever this year, celebrating its Golden Jubilee. The British Pavilion was prominent among the 13 buildings of foreign exhibitors, concrete evidence of South Africa's large and expanding international trade.

Like everything else at the Show, the flower garden is ambitiously planned. It cost £7,000 and includes many thousand imported blooms. But mainly the accent's on agriculture. The prize cattle, in particular, earned high praise from Mr. Philip Crowe, the retiring American Ambassador.

A Hereford bull was Supreme Champion of the Show. The gold trophy was presented to a representative of Harry Oppenheimer, the animal's owner. Then came some entertainment by a team of Northern Rhodesian Police.

Something to attract everybody at the Rand Easter Show.
