In their aerial Blitzkrieg on Britain, the Germans have lost hundreds of planes in a week or so. In attacking military objectives (and more oftenthan not hitting non-military objects) they have paid a price which must give Goering a headache. Our barrage balloons have worried the Nazis so much that they have lost dozens of planes in attempts to shoot them down. Maybe one British balloon is worth a squadron of Nazi planes. Their communiques will claim a couple of dozen battleships, anyway.

Time and again the boys of the R.A.F. go into action. Up and at 'em, back for more ammunition and up and at 'em again. Tearing them out of the skies like grouse on "the twelfth" of other years.

Another Nazi goes where he belongs - down, down into the waters of the English Channel, and it's still the English Channel.

Their planes torn apart by British fighters and withering shrapnel bursts, the Nazi pilots bail out one after the other, until they remind one of falling Autumn leaves - and here's proof.

Again we salute the Royal Air Force.
