And here seem to be the answers. At an Officers' Training School, Junior leaders are put through every phase of drill and instructional training, to equip them for the task of future leadership. In time, they themselves will impart the knowledge they acquire here to the men they command. A competent officer is able to use all types of weapons and perform the duties as expertly as the men he leads. To be worthy of the uniform he wears, an officer must be all that he expects his subordinates to be - a real fighting man.

In the lecture rooms, classes in Military tactics first absorb theory - - -
- - - and then proceed to put it into practice. After having received individual instruction, the officers are later put through full scale field exercises which closely resemble the real thing.

The whole of these exercises are carried out by officers only. Fully trained, they go through this special hardening course for modern warfare conditions, later returning to their units to put their men through the same exercises.
